It's hard enough to be eight years old, and wear your grandfather's old coat to school. It's even harder when the other kids laugh at how you walk and call you "Mooney" because you wear thick glasses. And it's harder still that your older brother Jarvis is a good athlete, with a natural talent for sports. The year was 1904 when little Norman was eight and with no radio, television or computers, his Dad would read to the family in the evening. His Dad read long complicated novels by the famous English author Charles Dickens. Norman let his imagination flow with the stories. He took his imagination one step further – he began sketching what he imagined the characters looked like. He used simple tools, just an ordinary pencil and some paper. He already found what he was good at in life. In fact he said later on when he was an adult, "Jarvis could jump over three orange crates; George Dugan could wiggle his ears; I could draw." By the time Norman Rockwell was twelve years old he knew he wanted to draw. As an adult, Norman Rockwell drew hundreds of famous illustrations that showed ordinary American life. He died in 1978.
